

MODAL AUXILIARIES

What are Modals?

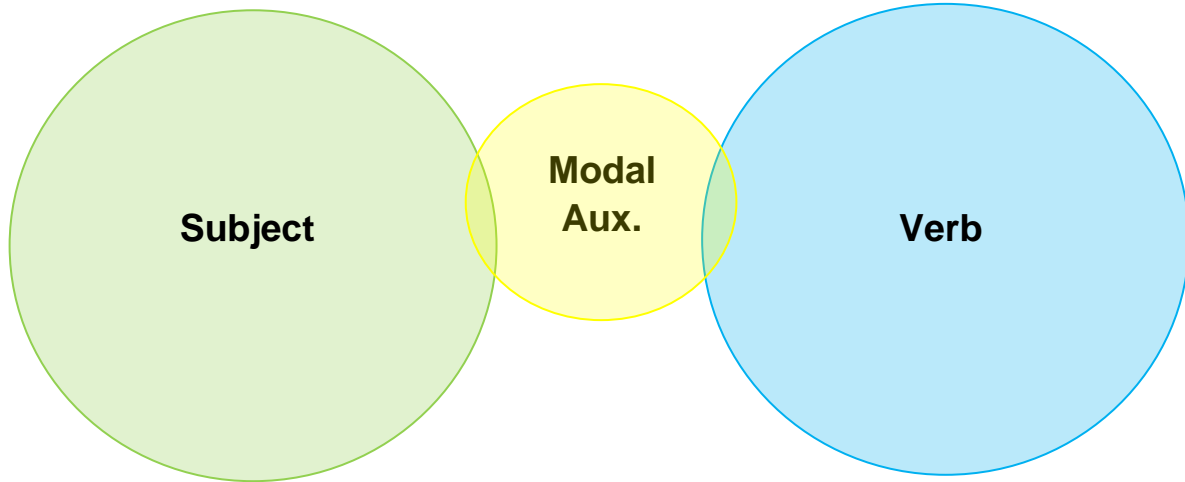

Modal auxiliaries are helping verbs which are used to indicate modality (likelihood, ability, permission, certainty and obligation). They give information about the tense and function of the main verb in the sentence. They exist only in relation to the main verbs, without which, they make little sense in the sentence.

Characteristics of Modals

How are Modals Used?

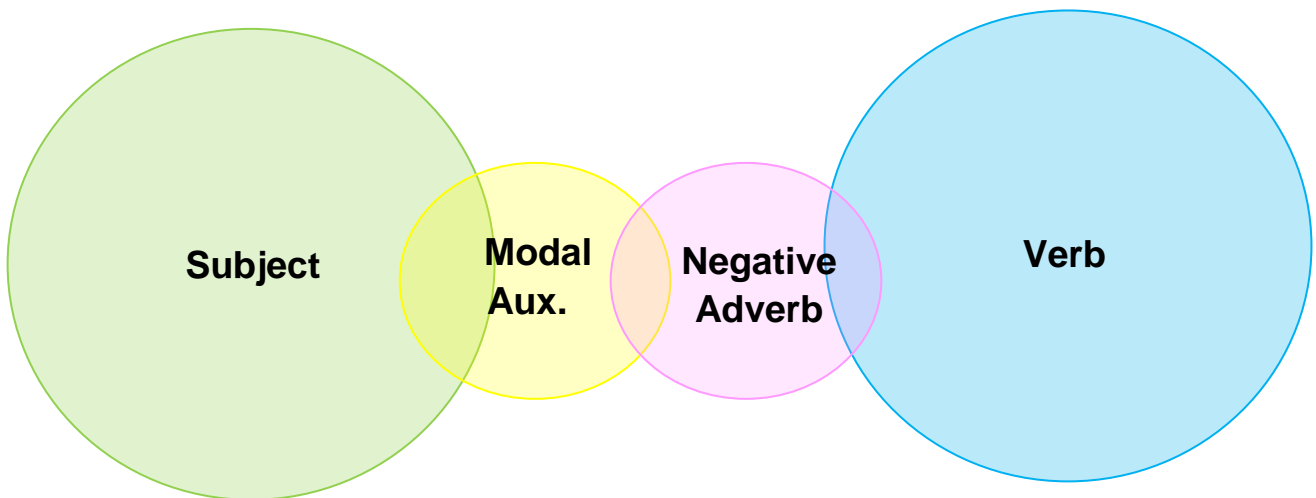

In affirmative sentences, the modal auxiliary is placed between the subject and the main verb.

They must call the authorities.

The students ought to bring their own materials.

In negative sentences, the modal auxiliary is placed between the subject and the negative adverb.

You should not procrastinate.

It may not rain today.

Rules of Modals

- They do not agree in number with the subject except for the modals 'need' and 'dare'.

She needs to go.	She can go.
They need to go.	They can go.

- With the exception of 'ought', 'need' and 'dare', the modal auxiliaries are followed by infinitive forms of verbs without the preposition 'to'.

She needs to listen.	Do you dare to dream?
I can help.	Rishab ought to study.

The modal auxiliary 'ought' + 'to' is used to duty, necessity, fitness, and moral obligation.

The modal auxiliary 'need' + 'to' is used to show requirement.

The verb 'dare' when followed by 'to' becomes a modal auxiliary and is used to show a challenge.

- They have no non-finite forms ('-en', '-ed' or '-ing' forms).
- All tense forms are not represented by the modal auxiliary.

Types of Modals

There are three types of modal auxiliaries:

- Single concept modals – having just one meaning
- Double concept modals – having two meanings
- Past modals – modals in the past tense
